UK Outlook for Sunday 30 May 2021 to Tuesday 8 Jun 2021:
High pressure will initially be dominant over the UK, with many areas experiencing warm, dry and sunny weather on Sunday and some of Monday, but a signalled spell of rain gradually moving in from the northwest on Monday marks a start of a change to more unsettled conditions. Showers are likely to be widespread through the middle of next week, many of which could be heavy and there is a risk of thunderstorms, more so in central and southeastern areas. Prolonged spells of rain are possible at times too. There will be some drier and brighter intervals but in general temperatures will be slightly below average during this unsettled period. By the end of the period, more settled conditions are expected to return and temperatures should recover to back average.
